

Carina Kroll, working at Norwood, a London-based Jewish charity organisation:

"At first, my supervisor gave me different pieces of information on the company such as on Jewish culture, the food policy and appropriate behaviour. Then I was allowed to scan a lot of cash sheets, save them on the computer and put them into the correct order. Luckily, these tasks are exactly the ones I like to do and I am very happy that all people there are very friendly.

After the lunch break, I was even allowed to help in the Norwood Shop in which they only sell donated stock, which means that they can sell everything at a lower price. This was a lot of fun and a wonderful experience as I have never worked in this area before. I did my best to be a helping hand like all the other employees."
